

himself hopelessly cornered, snarls, "It's your fault!"

"My husband and I would undoubtedly have been lost to each other if I had not done the proposing. That is why I am proud of having done it.

"The one who first realizes the affinity of heart and soul should make it known to the other. In a majority of cases this realization comes first to the woman."

Here is Mr. Boissevain's version of what happened when those three never-to-be-forgotten proposals were made:

"I never had even thought of proposing to Inez Milholland because I did not intend to marry. In general, I do not approve of marriage as an institution."

Yet Mr. Boissevain declares that the happiness of their married life and the fact that he still considers his wife the most charming woman in the world is due to frankness, honesty in telling him of her love and her honesty in every other matter that concerns them.

"I should feel the greatest disgust for any woman who came to the realization that she was in love with some man and yet was kept by cowardice and false pride from saying so.

"The courage of a woman who tells a man she loves him commands greater respect than any other thing I know.

"Marriage is fully as much an economic matter as a thing of sheer sentiment, and the man and woman should discuss all the advantages and the disadvantages together before binding themselves to each other. We talked the matter over as we would talk about any of the other important things of life. I came to see that Inez Milholland was right and we were married."
